

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
EASTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN

DAUNTE NICHOLS,

Petitioner,

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Respondent.

Case No. 20-CV-1153-JPS

ORDER

On December 22, 2014, petitioner Daunte Nichols (“Nichols”) pled guilty to five counts of Hobbs Act and bank robbery in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1951(a), 2113(a), (d), and one count of discharging a firearm in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1)(A)(iii). United States v. Nichols, 14-CR-177-JPS, (Docket #23). Nichols was sentenced to 100 months of imprisonment on the robbery charges, and 120 months on the firearm charge, for a total prison term of 220 months. Case No. 14-CR-177, (Docket #33).

On July 27, 2020, Nichols filed a motion pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2255 to vacate his 924(c) conviction. (Docket #1). That motion is now before the Court for screening:

If it plainly appears from the motion, any attached exhibits, and the record of the prior proceedings that the moving party is not entitled to relief, the judge must dismiss the motion and direct the clerk to notify the moving party. If the motion is not dismissed, the judge must order the United States Attorney to file an answer, motion, or other response within a fixed time, or to take other action the judge may order.

Rule 4(b), Rules Governing Section 2255 Proceedings.

Generally, the Court begins the screening process by examining the timeliness of the motion and whether the claims therein are procedurally defaulted. The Court need not address those matters in this case, however, because Nichols's sole ground for relief is plainly meritless. Nichols suggests that the Supreme Court's recent decision in Davis v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 2319 (2019), warrants vacating his Section 924(c) conviction. See generally (Docket #1 at 2).

To understand the import of Davis, one must first know a bit about Section 924(c). That statute imposes sentences, carrying substantial mandatory minimums for imprisonment, when a person uses a firearm during the commission of a "crime of violence." 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1)(A). A "crime of violence" must always be a felony, and it must also fall within one of two definitions. The first definition, known as the "elements" or "force" clause, says that the subject crime must "[have] as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another[.]" Id. § 924(c)(3)(A). The second definition, known as the "residual" clause, sweeps in any crime "that by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense." Id. § 924(c)(3)(B). Davis invalidated the residual clause as being unconstitutionally vague. Davis, 139 S. Ct. at 2336.

That ruling means little for those in the Seventh Circuit, as our own Court of Appeals struck down the residual clause some time ago. United States v. Cardena, 842 F.3d 959, 996 (7th Cir. 2016). Indeed, Davis also means little for Nichols himself. Hobbs Act Robbery has been found to fall within the elements clause, not the invalidated residual clause. United States v. Anglin, 846 F.3d 954, 964–65 (7th Cir. 2017) (holding that Hobbs Act robbery constitutes a “crime of violence” within the meaning of Section 924(c)(3)(A)). Thus, Nichols’s 18 U.S.C. § 1951 convictions serve as a valid predicate for the Section 924(c) conviction via the elements clause.

Nichols pled guilty to allegations that he “did unlawfully obstruct, delay, and affect commerce by robbery, and conspired to do so. . .by means of actual and threatened force, violence, and fear of injury. . .” in violation of the Hobbs Act. (Docket #23 at 2–3). Nichols’s arguments that conspiracy is not a crime of violence are entirely without merit. The conspiracy and the Hobbs Act Robbery are one and the same in this crime; he conspired to, and then did, take property that was not his by actual and threatened force, violence, and fear of injury. These are well-settled crimes of violence; indeed, in Anglin, the Seventh Circuit explained that Hobbs Act Robbery “necessarily requires using or threatening force.” 846 F.3d at 965. The Court is not empowered to overrule the Seventh Circuit. Thus, because Nichols is plainly not entitled to relief on the ground presented in his motion, the Court is compelled to deny the motion and dismiss this action with prejudice.

Under Rule 11(a) of the Rules Governing Section 2255 Cases, “the district court must issue or deny a certificate of appealability when it enters a final order adverse to the applicant.” To obtain a certificate of appealability under 28 U.S.C. § 2253(c)(2), Nichols must make a “substantial showing of the denial of a constitutional right” by establishing that “reasonable jurists could debate whether (or, for that matter, agree that) the petition should have been resolved in a different manner or that the issues presented were adequate to deserve encouragement to proceed further.” Miller-El v. Cockrell, 537 U.S. 322, 336 (2003) (internal citations omitted). No reasonable jurists could debate whether Nichols’s motion presented a viable ground for relief. Davis has no bearing on his convictions or sentence, and this Court lacks authority to overturn Anglin. As a consequence, the Court is compelled to deny a certificate of appealability as to Nichols's motion. Finally, the Court closes with some information about the actions that Nichols may take if he wishes to challenge the Court's resolution of this case. This order and the judgment to follow are final. A dissatisfied party may appeal this Court's decision to the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit by filing in this Court a notice of appeal within 30 days of the entry of judgment. See Fed. R. App. P. 3, 4. This Court may extend this deadline if a party timely requests an extension and shows good cause or excusable neglect for not being able to meet the 30-day deadline. See Fed. R. App. P. 4(a)(5)(A). Moreover, under certain circumstances, a party may ask this Court to alter or amend its judgment under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59(e) or ask for relief from judgment under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b). Any motion under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59(e) must be filed within 28 days of the entry of judgment. The Court cannot extend this deadline. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(b)(2). Any motion under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b) must be filed within a reasonable time, generally no more than one year after the entry of the judgment. The court cannot extend this deadline. See id. A party is expected to closely review all applicable rules and determine what, if any, further action is appropriate in a case.

Accordingly,

IT IS ORDERED that Petitioner's motion to vacate, set aside, or correct his sentence pursuant to Section 2255 (Docket #1) be and the same is hereby DENIED;

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that this action be and the same is hereby DISMISSED with prejudice; and

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that a certificate of appealability be and the same is hereby DENIED.

The Clerk of the Court is directed to enter judgment accordingly.

Dated at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, this 30th day of July, 2020.
